Overview
This media communications master’s prepares you to:
• Understand the use, diffusion, and impacts of new communication technologies.
• Manage traditional and digital communication tools in organizations.
• Write and deliver content using digital media including text, photos, audio, video, and websites.
• Use research tools to evaluate the effectiveness of technology, communication strategies, and media projects.
• Implement organizational communication plans through strategic use of multimedia tools.
• Use new technologies for media production and delivery.

Creating successful digital communication strategies also requires understanding assessments and metrics. You will learn:
• How real-time feedback is utilized by major media companies to track trends.
• How to understand analytics for all major media categories.
• How to decide if, and when, analytics can enhance your efforts.
• How to make sense of the implications and opportunities behind the numbers.
• How to present and utilize data to influence decision-making.
• How to incorporate data visualization to enhance your messages.

Curriculum
This program utilizes a hybrid course delivery method. Students take one face-to-face and one online course per semester in a cohort model that can be completed in six semesters.

Core communications classes meet once a week at the Denver Learning Center, with the potential to schedule additional meetings via teleconferencing. Elective coursework is completed online. Students earn 30 credits over four semesters plus two summer sessions. The program features intensive twelve-week terms in fall and spring, and summer sessions are four to six weeks in length.
